Built by United Technology Center at its California rocket production site, the double barreled booster stage produced 2½ million pounds of thrust as it hurled the Titan III-C towards space. Exactly as programmed, and with their liftoff task successfully completed, the solid motors were pushed away from the center core and fell into the ocean 135 miles down range. Launch officials are confident that this week's flight, with its intricate multiple payload, will be as spectacular a success as the previous launches.
